

Ryan Spowles

1a. Two universal evils:

1. Murder (killing with the intent to cause harm)
2. Cheating

1b. Two universal goods:

1. Providing a favor with no expectations of getting anything in return (provided the favor doesn't hurt or harm someone else)
2. Donating food/water to those who need it

2. Murder is the act of killing another person. If the killer was wronged and felt this was the only way to get back, it is still not justified because this not only affects the person that is killed but also the person's family and friends which is why it is universally evil. Cheating is universally evil because if one must cheat to get ahead then they don't deserve to be there. Even if it was to save a person's life, if they're told that doing said act and completing it will kill them, if they want to no one has the right to stop them. Providing a favor with no expectations of getting anything in return is something most people don't do, so when it happens it's something that should be appreciated. Donating food/water to those who need it is also a universal good. Even if people are doing it for the wrong reasons (self fulfillment) they're still helping people.

3. People shouldn't want to do universal evils, like murder for example. There are many ways to murder someone and something as small as a prank can easily escalate to someone dying and the person responsible has committed murder. To avoid that people must be able to imagine the worst case scenario and what would happen in that case. Cheating can be avoided by training to be better than the opponent. If someone were to die if they were to win an event, and you cheated to win, that doesn't mean they won't still die. Talk to the person and if they go in knowing and still want to, it means that they've chosen to go out doing what they love. Most people do favors and expect to get one in return, but with that mentality if a terminal kid asked someone for a favor, they couldn't expect to get anything in return, so the question becomes how many people would actually do it. As far as donating food/water to those who need it, it shouldn't just be food/water. Donating old clothes, money anything that can be used would be a good action that is stemmed off this belief.